

A two-phase flow formulation for reactive, porous flow

- Capillary tension, chemical dissolution, and matrix deformation lead to melt redistribution in Earth's deep interior
- Gibbs-Thompson effect controls melt distribution in the small length scales
- State of matrix aggregation control homogenization or self-separation
- Also useful in reading the chemical signature of metamorphic fluids near the crust

