Mesoscale computational model for compliant polymer networks was developed and validated.

We examined sliding friction between polymer networks and surfaces with different micro-topography and on adhesive surfaces.

We showed that anisotropic surfaces can be used to regulate friction forces.

Friction forces are controlled by internal stresses arising in sliding polymer networks.

The results point to new approaches for regulating friction using compliant polymers and micro-structured surfaces.